“Integration Military and Civilian in Trauma System to achieve zero preventable deaths after injury”

Scientific rationale

What is polytrauma?

Polytrauma occurs when a person sustains injuries to multiple body parts and organ systems often, but not always, as a result of accident-related events. Head trauma frequently occurs in polytrauma in combination with other disabling conditions, such as internal organ injuries, hemorrhages, amputations, burns, fractures, hearing and vision impairment, spinal cord injuries, post-traumatic stress disorder, and other conditions. Because of the severity and complexity of the injuries, civilian and military, multiple trauma patients require a high level of medical care as well as other supportive services.

Major advances in protective equipment and medical technologies have increased the survival rates of civilians and military personnel who have sustained multiple serious injuries or multiple traumas in road or other accidents or in combat areas.

From the early stages after the traumatic event, the importance of providing qualified coordinated and complete rehabilitation services to support a partial or total restitutio ad integrum of the patient has been ascertained.

The hallmark of care for multiple trauma patients is an interdisciplinary approach centered on the patient and his family in order to be able to address all aspects related to the trauma that, as such, will affect the person's entire life.
